1. HSIEH Hsueh-hung, leader of the Democratic League for Taiwan Autonomy, believes that the Chinese Communists are in no position to interfere in the affairs of the Taiwan Communist Party, which is under direct Soviet control.¹ The Democratic League for Taiwan Autonomy takes direct orders from Moscow and maintains only an administrative section in Peiping headed by LIN K'eng-sheng (林鏗生), who recently succeeded T'IENT Fu-ta (田富達).¹
2. In May 1951 the Taiwan Joint Administration Pact was signed by the USSR and Communist China. The pact included the following provisions, which will go into effect when Taiwan falls to the Communists:
 - a. The Democratic League for Taiwan Autonomy will set up an "autonomous" government, which will handle all local administrative affairs.
 - b. An administrative committee consisting of Chinese and Soviets responsible to their respective governments will be set up to operate all power plants, mines, and transportation facilities. The Taiwan government will have no control over this committee.
 - c. A Sino-Soviet joint military headquarters will be set up to control defenses and port facilities. One Soviet officer will be assigned to each important military unit on Taiwan.
 - d. The treaty will expire thirty years after it goes into effect.
